Now that she has a platform, Ilunga is ensuring she and her organisation keep learning and growing. This summer, she graduated from Andrews University in Michigan, via the Hong Kong Adventist College in Clearwater Bay, with a degree in psychology. And her agency is working with robotic automation company RPA (HK) to experiment with artificial intelligence as a tool to eliminate bias and add objectivity to the casting process by filtering out gender and cultural prejudices often faced by those seeking work.

Though there are signs of improvement, spurred by the discussions around racial equality happening all around the world as a result of the Black Lives Matter movement, Ilunga feels the Asian fashion industry still has a long way to go before it can claim to be truly inclusive. "It was hard being a Black model growing up and it still is. I cannot expect everything to change overnight, but with time things will be different. At least now we are having the conversation. The more people understand the value of diversity and representation, the better," she says.

Ilunga hopes to emulate the success of singer Rihanna, who is shifting perceptions and paving the way for inclusivity in fashion and in beauty through her beauty and lingerie brands, Fenty Beauty and Savage x Fenty, which spotlight diverse models. To do this, Ilunga will spend the next few years expanding her reach within Asia before setting her sights further afield. "The goal is to go global," she says. "My hope is that when people think of diversity and inclusion in modelling, the first thing that pops into their minds is Harmony HK."

ANISHA THAI
 "There are very few mixed Asian and Black people in Hong Kong. Representing a minority that is underrepresented is something that makes me proud and pushes me to keep going. We are now breaking the rules. What is exciting about this journey is that, together, we are building a new avenue for models from all races and backgrounds."

Anisha Thai, dancer; choreographer; model; civil engineer

Anisha Thai is a quadruple threat: A civil engineer by day, she is also a dancer, choreographer and model.

First arriving in Hong Kong in 2016, Thai — who is half-Comoran, half-Vietnamese and born and raised in Paris — is also an advocate for diversity and spreading Afro culture in Hong Kong.

“Since I have a diverse background, I thought ... let me explore the world,” remembers Thai. In 2016 she moved to London and worked in a civil engineering internship. The company then offered her a chance to work in an
